COLEBROOK

The lawn social held by the Ladies Aid on the grounds of the United Church was a decided success. The program given by the Ralph family, of Verona, Mr. Ivan and Mrs. Switzer, of Desmond, assisted by local talent, was very entertaining.

Albion Lodge 109 A.F. & A.M., Harrowsmith, held their annual family picnic at Galbraith's grove off Monday of last week, and had a very enjoyable day. About a hundred had dinner after which the chairman, E. F. Purcell, asked for order and after a few introductory remarks, called on Rev. Messrs. Farnsworth, Toronto, Johnson and Petten, Harrowsmith, Hon. Dr. J. W. Edwards, M. P., Sydenham and F. M. Galloway, Deferelt, N.Y. After the speaking Mrs. P. Galbraith gave a very interesting monologue. The gathering then adjourned to the sport field where the committee had arranged for games of nearly every kind, including tug-of war, boys' and girls' races, boys' and girls' softball and basketball. Good music was in abundance and was provided by the Wilton Orchestra.

Mrs. N. Davy is on the sick list.

Recent visitors were: Mrs. Boyce, Belleville, at N. Boyce's; F. M. Galloway at E. D. Shangraw's; M. Hart, Syracuse, at Mrs. O. Hart's; Miss Bailey, Kingston, at T. A. Keyes'.

A PROGRESSING BUSINESS

Though one of the newest industries in Napanee, the Ross-Miller Company are progressing nicely, and business is steadily increasing. The goods advertised by the company are being advertised and used from coast to coast. Only recently two car loads of their goods were shipped within a day or so of one another. One car went east to Prince Edward Island and the other to Calgary, Alberta.

The factory building contains the largest oven in Canada, which if run continuously could produce ten tons of cooked buiscuits per day. Very heavy machinery is necessary to manufacture their goods as an ordinary mixer will not mix the ingredients thick enough for their purpose.

Everything around the factory is kept scrupulously clean and the biscuits are made and packed with very little handling by hand, everything possible being done by the aid of machinery.

Fox and Dog Biscuits and other foods for these animals are put up in various forms and the demand for these goods is steadily increasing. Over 100,000 lbs. were sold in June.

SANDHURST.

Mr. and Mrs. Curtis and family, of Peterboro, spent the week-end with Mr. and Mrs. T. Mellow.

Mr. and Mrs. T. Gurren spent Sunday at the Sand Banks.

His small daughter was with him, but both were unhurt, but the car had two broken wheels. The bank is almost fifteen feet to the water, but the car struck a small tree along the shore and prevented the damage being any greater.

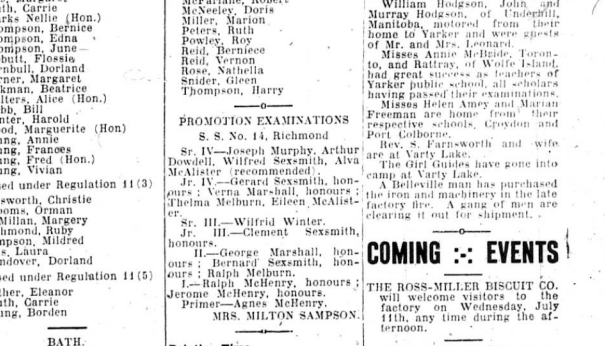
The Great Laurant at Redpath Tent



THE GREAT LAURANT

An amazing, spectacular production of magic and mystery will be presented by the Great Laurant, magician and wonder-worker, at a gala entertainment to be given at the Dominion Redpath Chautauqua here this season. Laurant is one of the suavest, most picturesque magicians ever seen upon the platform. He displays the arts and ingenuity of both ancient and modern conjurers. Hindu magic, the craft of the ancient Chinese, together with modern illusions and mysteries, follow each other with startling rapidity.

Laurant's show of wonders is a thrilling experience for all.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

BY G. C. TRUMBULL,
(Editor of The Sunday School Times.)

THE CONVERSION OF SAUL.

Sunday, July 15th.—Acts 9 : 1-19 ; 22:6-16 ; I. Corinthians 15 : 8.

Golden Text.—This is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners (I. Tim. 1:15).

God supernaturally intervenes in the life of an individual when it is His sovereign will to do so. We need not ask why ; we are to accept it as a fact when God's Word declares it. His intervention into the life of the murderous persecutor Saul, is one of the great and significant miracles of history. It is more than history; it is also prophecy. It is a stupendous expression of the grace of God.

Saul, the self-righteous Pharisee, was hunting down Christians to their death. "Yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord," he went on his way, and far out of his way, to accomplish his purpose. His threats were not empty ; he was a man of deeds as well as words ; and his deeds were deadly. With official letters he was on a journey for more than two hundred miles north from Jerusalem (by the roundabout roads he would have to take) to find and seize his victims in Damascus.

Saul's attitude at that time was the attitude of the Jewish nation toward Christ at His crucifixion, and the attitude maintained by the Jewish nation to this day, when they cried out against Christ : "Let Him be crucified.... His blood be on us, and on our children" (Matt 27 :22, 25).

But as Saul neared his goal about noon one day (and the noonday sun near Damascus, as the writer has seen it, is of dazzling brilliancy), a light from Heaven suddenly struck him to the earth—a light that made the sunshine seem like twilight.

Then came a voice : "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me ?" But Saul had been persecuting Christians, not some one in Heaven—so he thought. Yet he had been persecuting One in Heaven, for, as has been pointed out, in that challenging question to Saul, the Lord identified Himself with His people. Every Christian is a member of the body of Christ (I. Cor. 12 : 27), and the persecuting of Christians means literally the persecuting of Christ.

Saul asked in amazement "Who art Thou, Lord ?" The question was a humble and worshipful one. He was yielding to this Lord, whoever it might be. The reply was amazing : "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest." Not "the Messiah," or "Christ," but the human earthly name Jesus. Saul knew who it was : that Man of Nazareth of whom Peter had declared on the day of Pentecost : "Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ" (Acts 2:36).

With the astounding revelation came the further word, "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks." Saul, the zealous Pharisee, insistent on the law of Moses as the law of God had been persistently resisting God. It was hard for a strict Jewish religionist to do this, the Lord reminded him. He had been fighting against his own profession, as every Jew who rejects Christ today is doing.

It is to be noted that Saul, the proud Pharisee did not argue with this new Lord. Nor did he contradict. Nor did he defend himself. "Trembling and astonished," he said, 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do ?" Saul's heart and life were gone out of him. It is a good condition for a man to be in who has been fighting God. There came a brief "sealed order," telling him to go into the city and he should be told what to do.

Saul's human sight was gone now. Then he arose from the earth to which he had fallen in helplessness, and opened his eyes he could see nothing. The proud persecutor was led by the hand and brought to Damascus. What a contrast from the way he had expected to enter that city ! A helpless blind man, at the mercy of others, instead of a powerful leader, threatening and taking lives.

For three days he saw nothing, ate nothing, drank nothing. It was a period of darkness indeed, perhaps typifying the three days in which Christ Himself lay dead. For the old Saul had died, and a new man was coming out of the place of death.

The lesson goes on to tell how a Christian in Damascus was commissioned to minister to Saul, putting his hand on him that he might receive his sight, and bringing him the good news from the Lord Jesus Christ. This man, Ananias, told Saul how to be saved by calling on the name of the Lord, and gave him a profession commission from the God of their fathers to be His witness unto all men.

When Saul his name changed to Paul, writes of this in his great resurrection chapter to the Corinthians (I. Cor 15 : 8), he calls himself "one born out of due time." This does not mean born late, but born early, prematurely. How far ahead of time was Paul thus born into the new life ? At least nineteen centuries. For that was a startling, spectacular, supernatural, the result of the sovereign will and grace of God, is the great historical prophecy of the conversion of "all Israel" when Christ comes again. (See Zechariah 12:10 ; Romans 11:25-27).

The Beautiful Green Lake

The adventurers who first visited Jasper National Park, Canada's great national play ground in the heart of the Rocky Mountains, were concerned less with the marvellous scenic beauties of the Region than they were with finding a path, by through the mountain Ranges which seemed to bar their further progress.

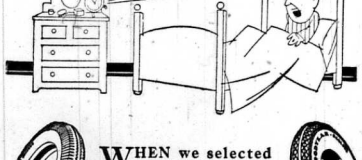
However, those who followed in their footsteps realized the beauties of the territory now included in the 5,300 square miles of Jasper National Park and in naming the lakes, rivers and peaks of this area, used names which were expressive of their characteristics.

Thus, in the case of the lake on the shore of which was later located Jasper Park Lodge, the magnificent log cabin bungalow hotel of the Canadian National Railways, the name Lac Beauvert (Beautiful Green Lake) was applied. That no more fitting name could have been chosen for this beautiful body of water is evident to every visitor to Jasper Park ; green water, reflecting the glory of the surrounding parks, greets the tourist when he strolls from his cabin at Jasper Park Lodge to the shore of this lake, and so free of vegetable matter is this icy cold water that he can easily read a newspaper which has been weighted and sunk under several feet of water.

Canoes and boats are available for those who would paddle or row over its glassy surface, and a swimming tank with heated water, has been constructed on the shore of the lake.

Jasper Park Lodge will be visited this year by members of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers' Association at the conclusion of their Annual Convention at the Macdonald Hotel, Edmonton, Alta.

Time to Buy TIRES



WHEN we selected our stock of tires we had specially in mind the owners of Chevrolet, Star, Ford and Whippet cars. That's one reason why we chose Goodyear Tires. For the Goodyear line makes every provision for the user of 30 x 3½ and 29 x 4.40 sizes. If price is the chief consideration we have the Pathfinder, both 30 x 3½ and 29 x 4.40. If you want the World's Greatest Tire, we have the All-Weather Tread, 30 x 3½, 29 x 4.40 and 30 x 4.50. And for the man whose car carries heavy loads or travels rough roads, we have the All-Weather Tread Heavy Duty. Every one of these tires is Goodyear built and gives full Goodyear value. Let us show them to you.

CHINESE EMIGRATION.

Arrivals In This Country Mostly Come From Canton.

The 3,229 Chinese in New Zealand are Cantonese. Their home, says Wm Mawson, of Auckland, N.Z., according to "Pacific Data," is in the Kwangtung (Canton) province of south China. They come from certain well-defined groups of villages, situated in various sections of the delta part of the province. It is very largely from these same districts that emigration has flowed to the United States, Canada, and Australia.

Emigration commenced with the discovery of gold in California, and the Chinese seem to have followed the train of gold-seekers when later on the movement extended to Australia and New Zealand. As the diggings became worked out, the Chinese turned to other occupations, market gardening and other occupations, as circumstances offered in each country. Once commenced this stream of emigration has been kept up and has tended to increase.

In Canada, the United States and Australia, a premium was once granted to Chinese laborers who would enter the country, but temporary permits are granted to students, business men and tourists. Victoria in Canada in 1894 raised the poll tax on Chinese to $500. New Zealand immediately became more desirable and there was a rise in the numbers of Chinese entering at £10 a head until the New Zealand Government equalized matters by raising the tax to £100.

The sharp rise in the number of Chinese immigrants in 1919 was due to post-war labor conditions in Canada, which led to the withdrawing of all fresh permits to Chinese laborers. The increase in New Zealand was thus accelerated. It was finally checked when the Government introduced the permit system, by which they are able to control at will the number of Chinese immigrants that are allowed to enter and settle in the country.

ANOTHER REFUGE FOR GAME.

Wealthy New Yorker Gives 488 Acres to Government.

The offer of James M. Munn, wealthy New Yorker, to give the Pike's Peak (namesake of its larger fellow in Colorado) area near McGregor to the Federal Upper Mississippi River Wild Life and Fish Refuge, and its acceptance by Congress, is hailed as facilitating the betterment of a Mississippi river national park.

More than 50,000 acres have been acquired by the Government of the total 200,000 acres between Rock Island, Ill., and Winona, Minn. provided for by act of Congress in 1924.

The land which Mr. Munn gives outright embraces 488 acres estimated to be worth between $30,000 and $40,000.

Pike's Peak, the dominant feature of the track given, is famed as the first land of the Northwest seen by white men. It rises opposite the mouth of the Wisconsin river, where Joliet and Marquette entered the Mississippi. The explorer, Zebulon Pike, after whom the hill was named, climbed it the year before he visited that other namesake of his in Colorado.

In a deep canyon on the north side of the peak and included in Mr. Munn's offer, are cliffs of sands of different colors. Other lands are forested hills and ravines adjacent to the river.

You home-loving people

The last few years have brought to town-dwellers many new conveniences and comforts.

They are making town life particularly attractive to a large number of home-loving people to whom city life with its higher cost of living does not make sufficient appeal.

Home-loving people are naturally strong for the home ties, and for keeping up friends. Long Distance enables them to keep in touch with a wide circle of friends in the surrounding territory, and the low rates are an inducement to do so.

Even where circumstances carry town-dwellers away, the recollection of the "home-town," of friends and neighbors is always present, and they look forward to talking with them, from time to time, by Long Distance.

SELECT BACON HOGS

'Money talks', quite as loudly to the farmer as to any other class. Today the farmer is fully conversant with the trend of the market, prevailing prices, and supply and demand. He is just as keen as the manufacturer, and when he knows he has produced an article of the size, type and quality that is in demand he has a perfect right to expect and, to get his share of the price premium the consumer pays for that article.

There are some engaged in the hog business who do not see or appreciate the full value of grading. The question must be considered in a broad sense, because the actual market requirements, domestic and export, are the basis for all standards covered by the regulations under the Live Stock and Live Stock Products Act.

In the production of bacon hogs, the farmer's objective is 'selects', because that grade is in demand, and commands the highest price. There is no doubt in the producer's mind as to the value of grading hogs, but there is occasionally some little difficulty in getting a price back to the producer commensurate with the quality of hogs marketed. This is being overcome, however, and today the compulsory grading, or marking for classification and grading on arrival at the yards is working well, and this combined with the producer's knowledge of market conditions is making for improvement in the quality of the bacon hogs marketed.

REROUTED RIVER.

Unique Founding of Lumber City In Great U. S. Forest Area.

A river has been turned from its course, 60 miles of railroad have been laid and high trestles across ravines have been built in the unique founding of the new town of Vale, in the heart of the last wilderness of the Pacific Northwest, says Christian Science Monitor.

Only a few months ago the site of this "million dollar town" was in an unbroken forest which extended over more than 100,000 acres. In order to log off this land the Weyerhauser Timber Company has planned and erected this town.

Besides the machine and car shops, round house, sand drier, oil house, office building, gasoline station, community store and hotel, there are 41 houses completed, with telephone, electric light and power service. Despite the fact that there are miles of timber in every direction, each home has a garage, and most of these are occupied.

The activities will create a payroll of fully $1,000,000 a year, officials estimate.

The Cooling Color.

Tests made by engineers with instruments that measured heat flowing through a sunlit roof showed that a white roof for a house is as cooling as the white clothes you wear in hot weather.

Shiny aluminium paint is even better, as it reflects away the sun's hot rays. A roof coated with it transmits thirty-eight per cent. less heat inward.

This probably works both ways, as in winter some heat escaping from the house may be reflected back again, resulting in a fuel saving.

South Sea Surgery.

According to Dr. Joseph Loebell, a ship's doctor, who has been studying native surgical science in the South Sea Islands, a patient about to undergo a surgical operation is anesthetized by being knocked unconscious with a stone club. They also have an effective way of stopping the spread of epidemics. They simply kill outright every person affected with the disease.

CONTROLLING LATE BLIGHT OF POTATOES

(Experimental Farms Note.)

Late blight including its consequential tuber rot, is recognized as the most destructive disease of potatoes in Canada, particularly the Maritime Provinces, it is worst during August and September when the weather is damp. It may appear in July if weather conditions are favourable. It is not active during hot, dry weather This disease is recognized by characteristic brownish or blackish blotches which usually begin at the edge or tip of the leaf and spread over the entire surface. During moist weather these areas appear water soaked, and are covered on the under surface with a fine greyish-white mildew. The affected areas soften and give off a disagreeable odour common to decayed vines. These symptoms, accompanied by the wilting of the leaves, provide an easy diagnosis. In severe cases the disease will spread to the stems.

Tubers under affected tops are subject to the disease. Spores which fall from the leaves are washed into contact with the tubers and cause infection, which develops into the form of purplish areas which become sunken at digging time, or later in storage. The flesh takes on a rusty brown colour, which extends normally into the tuber about one-fourth of one inch This condition is known as dry rot.

Successful control of this disease is dependent upon thorough spraying of the plants with Bordeaux mixture. Five to seven applications are necessary, starting when the plants are six to eight inches high and continuing at intervals of eight to ten days throughout the growing season. In cloudy weather spray every week.

Spraying operations should be performed with three nozzels to the row. One nozzle directed on the spray downward, while the other two should be adjusted to spray upward, covering the lower surfaces of the leaves The pump should be capable of delivering the spray under not less than 150 pounds pressure.

The formula for making Bordeaux Mixture is as follows :

Bluestone (copper suphate..4 lbs.
Stone lime	4 lbs.
Water	40 gallons

It is not advisable to use a stronger solution. If greater efficiency is desired, increase the pressure and the number of nozzles to the row and go over the field a second time in an opposite direction.

The bluestone must be dissolved and the lime slaked in different containers. Each solution is diluted with half the water (20 gallons) To complete the mixing pour the two dilute solutions together into the spray tank using a strainer to avoid after clogging of the spray nozzles.

Those requiring large quantities of Bordeaux Mixture should make up stock solutions of the bluestone and lime. These solutions keep indefinitely and are prepared as follows:

Dissolve 40 pounds of bluestone in 40 gallons of water by hanging it in a cloth bag just at the surface of the water. Each gallon of water will contain one pound of bluestone. Make up 40 pounds of stone lime in a small amount of water and make up to 40 gallons. Each gallon of water will contain one pound of lime.

Bordeaux Mixture can now be made up directly in the sprayer by filling it half full of water, and adding to the capacity of 40 gallons, add two gallons of the stock solution of bluestone and two gallons of the stock solution of lime, after which the cask can be nearly filled with water and two gallons more of the stock solutions added. If the container is not full add the necessary amount of water. If the sprayer has a larger tank it is merely necessary to add the proportionate amounts of the stock solutions.

While spraying is the essential factor in controlling blight, other practices are exceedingly profitable Experiments performed at the Laboratory of Plant Pathology, Experiment Station, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, have shown that keeping the tubers well covered with earth largely prevents blight when blight is severe. In late September or early October it has been found profitable to kill the tops off with a strong solution of bluestone (15 lbs. to 40 gals. of water.) By delaying digging for two weeks after the tops are dead, much blight rot will be avoided.

Potato growers should look upon spraying as a business proposition. It is one of the necessary operations for the successful culture of potatoes and should not be neglected.

A DESERT TREK.

Great Herds Cross Barren Lands In Syria Without Food or Water.

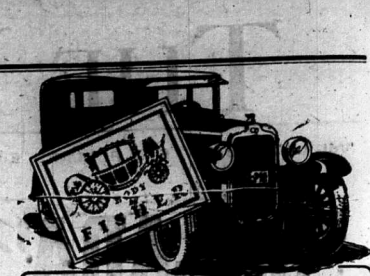
Early every spring large flocks of sheep and goats migrate westward from the grazing grounds on the flanks of the mountains of Kurdistan, Irak, Persia and Turkey.

Some start at Mosul and points east, trek along the Syrian desert followed only by a solitary shepherd or two, on their way to Aleppo. What remains of the flocks is herded south to Syrian and Palestine markets.

They will not be hustled, these large flocks, and the advent of the automobile has made no difference to the habits of sheep and goats. If a flock is met on the road the car must, very often wait until the very last one has passed in front of it.

How the animals make the long and dreary trek across the desert with its scanty grazing and scantier water is one of the wonders of the east. They must, as Mark Twain remarked apropos the Palestine goats, thrive on pebbles.

The sheep trade with Syria and Palestine opens the only door to the west for the breeders in the isolated and scarcely accessible points in the east. Mosul merchants purchase with the proceeds of the sale of the sheep European goods to be had on the Mediterranean coastal towns in Syria and Palestine.—Christian Science Monitor.



Another Way to Say the Finest of Low Priced Sixes

JUST as the "sterling" imprint on silver identifies the best, so the mark of Fisher on its bodies distinguishes a car from others in its field. When you speak of Pontiac as the lowest-priced six with bodies by Fisher, you are merely finding another way to say—"the finest of low-priced sixes."

For no other six of such low price offers the score of advantages which make the Pontiac Six the value leader of its entire class. Certainly none other offers any major feature comparable to the staunch, smart coachwork that the Fisher emblem represents.

Not only in style and color—not only in roominess and luxury of interiors—but also in sturdiness and quality of construction, Pontiac-Fisher bodies establish a standard never before attained in a six at Pontiac price. Like Pontiac itself, they are noted for ruggedness and long life. Like Pontiac itself they provide every element required for complete satisfaction and for justifiable owner pride. P-7-7-28C

FRENCH GIRLS OF TO-DAY.

Completely Upset Old French Notion of Decorum.

Paris youth is flabbergasting papas and mammas with a new set of party manners.

Girls of high school age go alone to dances now and they meet there their "dancers," often unknown to the hostess, but invited at the suggestion of the girls. In definite contrast with their parents, who look askance at foreigners, the girls show decided preference for all nationalities of the globe, except their own.

Instead of the time-honored method of the hostess providing the buffet lunch, each girl brings sandwiches, cakes and so forth and the boy is expected to bring a bottle of champagne. That sounds rather wicked for young people, but as champagne is expensive a goodly proportion of the boys bring only their own charming selves. Those who bring wine get a cheap variety that is first cousin to apple cider and there rarely is any intoxicating quantity.

Introductions are getting to be a lost art, but if a boy is a good dancer, the girls enquire his name and address and he shortly receives invitations to other parties at houses where he has never been.

The girls scorn the boys their families know and they completely upset the old French notion of decorum which requires a girl to be chaperoned everywhere until her debut.

Where the Volt Got Its Name.

The volt, the unit of electro-motive force, is named after Alessandro Volta, the great Italian scientist, who made many discoveries, and invented a new electric battery. The centenary of Volta's death was observed recently at Como, where he was born in 1745 and died in 1827. A volt is such a force as would carry one ampere of current against one ohm resistance.

AIKENSIDE

BY MARY J. HOLMES

Author of "Dora Deane," "The English Orphans," "Lena Rivers," "The Rector of St. Mark's," "Tempest and Sunshine," Etc.

"Might I ask him?" Flora persisted, her hand still on the plate.

"No." Agnes would attend to that, and also see Miss Clyde. All Flora had to do was to remove the plate which she finally did, muttering to herself: "Such airs! but I know Mr. Guy won't stand it."

Meantime Maddy had put on her prettiest chintz, tied her little dainty black silk apron, Mrs. Noah's gift, and with the feeling that she was looking unusually well, started for the parlor to meet her employer, Mrs. Agnes. Jessie had gone in quest of her brother, and thus Agnes was alone when Maddy Clyde first presented herself before her. She had not expected to find Maddy so pretty, and for a moment the hot blood crimsoned her cheek, while her heart throbbed wildly beneath the rich morning dress. Dr. Holbrook had cause for being attracted by that fresh, bright face, she thought, and so she steeled herself against the better impulses of her nature, impulses which pleaded that for the sake of the past she should be kind to Maddy Clyde.

"Ah, good-morning. You are Jessie's governess, I presume," she said, bowing distantly, and pretending not to notice the hand which Maddy involuntarily extended toward her. "Jessie speaks well of you, and I am very glad you suit her. You have had a pleasant time, I trust?"

Her voice was so cold and her manner so distant that Maddy's eyes for an instant filled with tears, but she answered evilly that she had been very happy, and everybody was very kind. It was harder work to put down Maddy Clyde than Agnes had expected, and after a little further conversation there ensued a silence, which neither was inclined to break. At last, summoning all her courage, Agnes began:

"Excuse me, Miss Clyde, but your own good sense, of which I am sure you have an abundance, must tell you that now Mr. Remington and myself are at home, your intercourse with our family must be rather limited—that is—there—that is, neither Mr. Remington nor myself are accustomed to having our governess very much with us. I suppose you have had the range of the parlors, sitting there when you liked, and all this was perfectly proper, Mind, I am finding no fault with you. It is all quite well, so far as you continued, as she saw the strange look of terror and surprise visible on Maddy's face. "The past is right, but in future it will be a little different. I am willing to accord to a governess all the privileges possible. They are human as well as others, but social rank makes a difference. Don't you know it does?"

"Yes—no—I don't know. Oh, pray, tell me what I am to do!" Maddy gasped, her face as white as ashes, and her eyes wearing as yet only a scared, uncertain look.

With little, graceful tosses of the head, which set in motion every one of the brown curls, Mrs. Agnes replied:

"You are not, of course, to go to Mr. Remington. It is my mutter, and does not concern him. What I would do this: You are to come to the parlor only when invited, and are not to intrude upon me at any time, especially arly when company is here, such as—well, such as Dr. Holbrook, if you please. As you cannot be with Jessie all the while, you will have many leisure hours for study, just as in your own room, or the schoolroom, or walk in the back yard, just as the higher servants do—such as Mrs. Noah and the sewing girl, Sarah. Occasionally we shall have you in to dine with us, but usually you will take your meals with Mrs. Noah and Sarah. By following these directions you will, I think, give entire satisfaction."

When Mrs. Agnes had finished this, Maddy began to understand her position, and to her white face the hot blood poured indignantly. Wholly inexperienced, she had never dreamed that a governess was a servant, to sit at the same table with her employer, that she must never enter the parlors unbidden, or intrude herself in any way. No matter that her cheeks burned at the degradation, or that, for an instant, she felt like defying the proud woman to her face. But the angry words trembling on her tongue were repressed as she remembered her grandfather's teachings, and with a bow as haughty as Mrs. Agnes could have made, and a look on her face which could not easily be forgotten, she left the room, and in a kind of stunned bewilderment sought the garden, where she could, unseen, give way to her feelings.

Once alone, the torrent burst forth, and burying her face in the soft grass, she wept bitterly, never hearing the step coming near, and not at first heeding the voice which asked what was the matter. Guy Remington, who had come out into the garden, accidentally wandering that way, and so stumbling upon the little figure crying in the grass. He knew not Maddy, and greatly surprised to find her thus, asked what was the matter. Then, as she did not hear him, he laid his hand gently upon her shoulder, compelling her to look up. In all her imaginings of Guy, she had never associated with the man who had so puzzled and confused her, and now she did not for a time suspect the truth. She only thought him a guest at Aikenside; someone come with Guy, and her degradation seemed greater than before. She was not surprised when he called her by name; of course he remembered her, just as she did him, but she did wonder a little what Mrs. Agnes would say, could she know how kindly he spoke to her, lifting her from the grass and leading her to a rustic seat at no great distance from them.

"Now, tell me why you are crying so?" he said, brushing from her silk apron the spot of dirt which had settled upon it. "Are you homesick?" he continued, and Maddy burst out again.

She forgot that he was a stranger, forgot everything except that he sympathized with her.

"Oh, sir, I was so happy here till they came home. Mrs. Remington and Mr. Guy. I never thought it was a disgrace to be a governess; never heard it was so considered, or that I was not good enough to eat with them, till she told me this. Oh, dear, dear!" and choked with tears Maddy stopped a moment to take breath.

She did not look up at the young man beside her, and it was well she did not, for the dark expression of his face would have frightened her. Half guessing the truth, and impatient to hear more, he said to her:

"Go on," he sternly, that she started, and replied:

"I know you are angry with me and I ought not to have told you."

"I am not angry—not at you, at least—go on," was Guy's reply, and Maddy continued:

"She told me now they had come home it would be different, that only when invited must I come to the parlor, or anywhere, but must stay in the servants' part, and eat with Mrs. Noah and Sarah. I'd just as soon do that. I am no better than they, only only—the way she told me made me feel so mean, as if I was not anybody, when I am," and here Maddy's pride began to rise. "I'm just as good as she, if grandpa is poor, and I won't stay here to be treated like a nigger by her and Mr. Guy. I liked him so much, too, because he was kind to grandma and to me when I was sick. Yes, I did like him so."

"And now he is new?" Guy asked, wondering who in the world she thought he was. "How is it now?"

"I s'pose it's wicked to feel such things on Sunday, but Sunday or not, she said keeps making me so bad that I know I hate her, and I guess I hate Mr. Guy!"

This was Maddy's answer, spoken deliberately, while she looked up at the young man, who, with a comical expression on his face, repeated:

"I am Mr. Guy?"

"Yes, you! Oh, I can't bear it! will die!" and Maddy sprang up a frenzy as if feeling an electric shock.

But Guy's arm was interposed to stop her, and Guy's arm held her back, while he asked her where she was going.

"Anywhere out of sight where you can never see me again," Maddy sobbed vehemently. "It is bad enough to have you think me a fool, as you must, but now, oh, what do you think of me?"

"Nothing bad, I assure you," Guy said, still holding her and trying to keep her there. "I suppose you knew who I was, but as you did not, I forgive you for hating me so cordially. If you thought I sanctioned what Mrs. Remington has said to you, you had cause to dislike me, but, Miss Clyde, I do not, and this is the first intimation I have had that you were to be treated other than as a lady. I am master of Aikenside, not Mrs. Agnes, who shall be made to understand as much."

"Oh, please don't quarrel about me. Let me go home, and then all will be well," Maddy said, looking at him for a moment, more averse to leaving Aikenside than she could have thought it possible.

"We shall not quarrel; but I shall have my way; meanwhile go to your room and stay there until told that I have sent for you."

They went to the house together, but separated in the hall; Maddy repairing to her room, while Guy sought Mrs. Agnes. The moment she saw his face she knew a storm was coming, but was not prepared for the biting sarcasm and bitter reproaches heaped upon her by one who, when roused, was a perfect hurricane.

Maybe she had forgotten what she was when his father married her, he said, but he had not, and he remembered well the wonder expressed by many that his father could stoop to marry a poor school-teacher. "Yes, that's what you were madam, much as your despise Maddy Clyde for being a governess; you were one once yourself, and before that time mercy knows what you were—a hired girl, perhaps—your present airs would seem to warrant as much!"

Guy was in a sad passion by this time, and failed to see the effect his last words had on Agnes, who turned livid with rage and terror, but smothering her wrath, said coldly:

"Pray, Guy, do not be angry; I know I am foolish about some things, and proud people who 'come up,' as you say, always are, I guess. I know that marrying your father made me what I am, but everybody does not know it, and it is not necessary they should. I don't remember exactly what I did say to this Clyde girl, but I thought it would be pleasanter for you, pleasanter for us all, not to have her always around; it seems she has presided at the table when Dr. Holbrook was here to tea, and even you can't think that quite right."

"I don't know why," and at mention of Dr. Holbrook's name Guy's temper burst out again. "Agnes, you can't deceive me; I know the secret of your abominable treatment of Maddy is jealousy."

"Guy—jealous, I jealous of that child?" And Agnes' voice was expressive of the utmost contempt.

"Yes, jealous of that child; you think that because the doctor has been kind to her, perhaps he wants her some time for his wife. I hope he does; I mean to help it on; I'll tell him to have her, and if he don't I'll almost marry her myself!" and Guy paced up and down the parlor, chafing and foaming like a young lion.

Agnes was conquered and quite as much bewildered as Maddy had been; she heard only in part how Maddy Clyde was henceforth to be treated.

"Yes, yes," she gasped at last, as Guy talked on, "stop now for mercy's sake, and I'll do anything, only not this morning, my head aches so I cannot go to the breakfast table; I must be excused," and holding her temples, which were throbbing with pain, induced by strong excitement, Agnes hurried to her own room and threw herself upon the bed, angry, mortified, subdued.

The breakfast bell had rung twice while Guy was holding that interview with Agnes, and at last Mrs. Noah came up herself to learn the cause of the delay; standing in the hall, she heard a part of what was transpiring in the parlor. Mrs. Noah was proud and jealous of her master's dignity, and once or twice she thought had crossed her mind that perhaps when he came home Maddy would be treated more as some governesses were treated by their employers, but to have Agnes take the matter up was quite a different thing, and Mrs. Noah smiled with grim satisfaction, as she heard Guy issuing orders as to how Miss Clyde should be treated. Standing back to let Jessie pass, she waited a moment, and then, as if she had just come up, presented herself before Guy, asking if he were ready for breakfast.

"Yes, call Miss Clyde; tell her I sent her her," was Guy's answer, and forthwith Mrs. Noah repaired to Maddy's room, finding her still sobbing bitterly.

"I cannot go down," she said; "my face is all stains, and it's so dreadful happening on Sunday, too. What would grandpa say?"

"You can wash off the stains. Come," Mrs. Noah said, pouring water into the bowl; and bidding Maddy hurry, as Mr. Guy was waiting breakfast for her.

"But I am not to eat with them," Maddy began, when Mrs. Noah stopped her by explaining how Guy ruled that house, and Agnes had been completely routed.

This did not quiet Maddy particularly, and her heart beat painfully as she descended to the parlor, where Guy was still walking up and down.

"Come, Miss Clyde, Jessie is nearly famished," he said pleasantly, as Maddy appeared, and without the slightest reference to what had passed he drew Maddy's arm within his own, and giving a hand to Jessie, who had just come in, he went to the breakfast room, where Maddy was told to preside.

Guy watched her closely without seeming to do so, mentally deciding that she was neither vulgar nor awkward. On the contrary, he thought her very pretty, and very graceful for one so unaccustomed to society. Nothing was said of Agnes, who kept her room the entire day, and did not join the family until evening, when Guy sat upon the piazza with Jessie in his lap, while Maddy was not very far away. At first there was much constraint between Agnes and Maddy, but with Guy to manage, it soon were away, and Agnes felt herself exceedingly amiable when she reflected how gracious she had been to her rival.

But Maddy could not so soon forget. All through the day the conviction had been settling upon her that she could not stay at Aikenside, and so on the following morning, just after breakfast was over, she summoned courage to ask Mr. Guy if she might talk with him. Leading the way to the library, he bade her sit down. He took the chair opposite, and then waited for her to commence.

Maddy was afraid of Guy. He did not seem quite like Dr. Holbrook. He was a haughtier man, in appearance, while his rather elaborate style of dress and polished manners gave him, in her estimation, a kind of superiority over all the men she had ever met. Besides that, she remembered how his dark eyes had flashed when she told him what Mrs. Agnes had said yesterday, and also that she had said to his face that she hated him. She could not bear to leave a bad impression on his mind, so the first words she said to him were:

"Mr. Remington, I can't stay here after all that has happened. It would not be pleasant for me or Mrs. Agnes, so I am going home, but I want you to forget what I said about hating you yesterday. I did not then know who you were. I don't hate you. I like you, and I want you to like me."

She did not look at him, for her eyelids were cast down, and her lashes were wet with tears she could not keep back. Understanding, Guy had never known much about girls of Maddy's age, and there was something extremely fascinating in the artless simplicity of this child, half woman, sitting there before him, and asking him so demurely to like her. She was very pretty, he thought, and with proper culture would make a beautiful woman. Then, as he remembered his avowed intention of urging the doctor to make her his wife some day, the idea flashed upon him that it would be very generous, very magnanimous in him to educate that young girl expressly for the doctor, and though he hardly seemed to mean it all as replying to Maddy, he had in the brief interval formed a skeleton plan, and seen it in all its bearings and trimmphal result.

"I am much obliged for your liking me," he said, a little mischievously. "You surely have not much reason so to do when you recall the incidents of our first interview. Maddy—Miss Clyde—I have come to the conclusion that I knew less than you did, and I beg your pardon for annoying you so terribly."

Then, briefly, Guy explained to her how it all happened, blaming himself far more than he did the doctor, who, he said, had repented bitterly.

"Had you died, Miss Clyde, when you were so sick, I half believe he would have felt it his duty to die also. He likes you very much; more indeed than any patient I ever knew him to have," and Guy's eyes glanced curiously at Maddy to witness the effect his words might have upon her. But Maddy merely answered:

"Yes, I think he does like me, and I know I like him."

Mentally chiding himself for trying to find in Maddy's head an idea which evidently never was there, he began to speak of her proposition to leave, saying he should not suffer it, Jessie needed her and she must stay. She was not to mind the disagreeable things Mrs. Remington had said. She was tired and nervous, and so gave way to some very preposterous notions, which she had picked up somewhere. She would treat Maddy better hereafter, and she must stay. It was pleasanter for Jessie to have a companion so near her own age. Then, as he saw signs of yielding in Maddy's face, he continued:

"How would you like to turn scholar for a short time each day, I being your teacher? Time often hangs heavily upon my hands, and I fancy the novelty of the thing would suit me. I have books, will appoint your lessons and the hour for recitation."

Guy's face was flushed by the time he had finished speaking, for suddenly he remembered to have once read of a similar instance which resulted in the marriage of the teacher and pupil, and for a moment he feared to suggest such a thing, when it was known that he, the fashionable and handsome Guy, was teaching a pretty, attractive girl like Maddy Clyde, and he sincerely hoped she would decline. But Maddy had no such intention. With her beautiful eyes full of tears, which shone like diamonds, as she lifted them to Guy's face, she said:

"Oh, I thank you so much. You could not make me happier, and I'll try so hard to learn. They don't teach such things at the district school, and when there was a high school in Honedale I could not go, for it was three dollars a quarter, and grandpa had no three dollars for me. Uncle Joseph needed help, and so I stayed at home. It's dreadful to be poor, but, perhaps I shall some time be competent to teach in a seminary, and won't that be grand? When may I begin?"

Guy had never met with so much frankness and simplicity in anyone, unless it were Lucy Atherstone, of whom Maddy reminded him somewhat, except that the latter was more practical, more—he hardly knew what—only there was a difference, and he thought crossed his mind that if Maddy had all Lucy's advantages, and was as old, she would be what the world called smarter. There was no disparagement to Lucy in his thoughts, only a compliment to Maddy who was waiting for him to answer her question. There was no retracting now; he had offered his services; she had accepted; and with a mental exclamation: "I dread doc's fun the most, so I'll explain to him how I am cheating her for the future Mrs. Dr. Holbrook," he replied:

"As soon as I am rested from my journey, or sooner, if you like; and now tell me, please, who is this Uncle Joseph you have spoken of?"

He remembered what the doctor had said of a crazy uncle, but wishing to hear Maddy's version of it, put her the question he did.

"Uncle Joseph is grandma's youngest brother," Maddy answered, "and he has been in the lunatic asylum for years. As long as his little property lasted, his bills were paid, but now they keep him from charity, only I have to help, he can, and buys some little nice things which he wants so badly, and sometimes cries for, they say. I visited heroine all last summer, and sold them to buy him a thin coat and pants. We should have had a good time, Guy, this is unfounded gossiping neighborhood, and folks will talk, I'm afraid."

"Talk about what?" and Guy bridled up as his independent spirit began to rise. "What harm is there in my doing a generous act for a poor girl like Maddy Clyde? Isn't she graceful as a kitten, though?" and Guy nodded toward the spot where she was playing.

It annoyed the doctor to have Guy praise Maddy, but he would not show it, and answered:

"It's all right in you, but just because the poor girl is Maddy Clyde, folks will talk. She is too handsome, Guy; too graceful, too lady-like and womanly, but she needs educating, of course, and I am going to do it. You ought to thank me, instead of looking so like a thundercloud," and Guy laughed merrily.

The doctor was ashamed of his mood, and could not tell what prompted him to answer:

"I am obliged to you, Guy; but, as far as I am concerned, you may spare yourself the trouble. If my wife need educating, I can do it myself."

Guy was puzzled. Could it be that, after all, he was deceived, and the doctor did not care for Maddy? It might be, and he hastened to change the conversation to another topic than Miss Clyde. The doctor stayed to dinner, and as they watched him closely, he made up his mind that he did care for Maddy Clyde, and this confirmed him in his plan of educating her for him.

Magnanimous Guy! He felt himself very good, very generous, very condescending, and very forgiving, the early portion of the afternoon, but later in the day he began to view Guy Remington in the light of a martyr, and martyrdom consisting in the scornful toss of the head with which Agnes had listened to his plea, and the stern opposition of Mrs. Noah.

"Was he beside himself?" she asked, this worthy asked. "She liked Maddy Clyde, to be sure, but it wasn't for him to demean himself by turning her schoolmaster. Folks would talk awfully, and she couldn't blame 'em. Besides, that wasn't all. Guy was a-bein' alone in a room with a girl as pretty as Maddy? It was a duty to her to speak to Guy about her opinion of it, and if she said 'twas right, why, go it."

This was the drift of Mrs. Noah's remarks, and as Guy depended much on her judgment, he decided to write to Lucy to see if she had the slightest objections to his teaching Maddy Clyde. Accordingly, he wrote that very night, telling her frankly all he knew concerning Maddy Clyde, and narrating the circumstances under which he first had met her, being careful also to repeat what he knew would have weight with an English girl like Lucy, to wit, that though poor, Maddy's father and grandfather Clyde had been gentlemen, the one a clergyman, the other a merchant. Then he told of her desire for learning, and his plan to teach her himself of what the doctor and Mrs. Noah had said about it, and his final determination to consult her. There he described Maddy herself, feeling a strange thrill as he told how pure, how innocent, how artless and beautiful she was, and asked if Lucy agreed aught from his association with her.

"If you don't," he wrote, "you have but to say so, and I shall at once be committed. I will extricate myself in some way, rather than wound you in the slightest degree."

It would be some time ere an answer to this letter could be received, and until such time Guy could not honorable bear Maddy's lessons as he had agreed to do. But Maddy was not suspicious, and accepting his trivial excuse, waited patiently, while he, too, waited for the letter, wondering what it would contain.

At last the answer came and it

CABIN LINERS SET NEW STANDARD

Upper right—A general view of the vessel looking aft. Upper left—An interior view showing the cabin smoking room with its luxurious decorations. Lower—"The Duchess of Bedford" as she appeared when coming up the St. Lawrence River. Inset—Capt. H. Sibbons, commander of the "Duchess of Bedford."

PROOF that the St. Lawrence route is rapidly increasing in popularity and that an era of continued prosperity is predicted for her ports, is shown by the addition of four new cabin class liners of the new "Duchess" type to the Atlantic fleet of the Canadian Pacific.

The Duchess of Bedford, leader of this quartette of the largest liners to Montreal, arrived in that port at 8.45 p.m. June 8th, having completed her maiden voyage in exactly seven days after leaving Liverpool. The liner is over 20,000 tons gross register, is oil burning, two funnelled, and measures 600 feet in length and 75 feet in width. She will carry Cabin Class, Tourist Third Cabin, and Third Class passengers. In each class broad deck space is available, and accommodation is far superior to more expensive quarters on Atlantic liners of not long ago. The three sister ships of the Duchess of Bedford, now under construction in the shipbuilding yards of the Clyde, are the Duchess of Atholl, Duchess of Cornwall, and Duchess of Richmond.

The discoveries of radio engineers have aided in making the Duchess of Bedford an outstanding marine personality. For instance, while the ship's orchestra is playing in the Cabin Dining Room the music is relayed by means of microphones and amplifiers to the Tourist Third Cabin and Third Class Lounges and decks. Loud-speakers also simplify the transmission of orders to the forecastle, crow's nest, and docking-bridge.

Other interesting facts about the construction of the Duchess of Bedford are that the twin propellers weigh 16½ tons each, and the 186 foot steel shafts connecting them with the powerful turbine engines weigh about 108 tons. Nearly two million rivets were used in the ship, totalling 1,000 tons in themselves, some of the plates having as many as 650 rivets each.

The advent of the "Duchesses" greatly increases the passenger and freight services maintained by the Canadian Pacific on the St. Lawrence route. The schedule of passenger sailings had already been increased this summer by speeding the "turn about" of the Empresses from a four-weekly basis to meet the expected expansion of traffic. The "Beaver" class of ships, newcomers to the St. Lawrence also, have been placed by the Canadian Pacific on an exclusively freight service. They run regularly between Montreal and London and continental ports, making almost as good time as the passenger liners.

Weese—Windover.

A quiet but pretty wedding was solemnized at 10 o'clock on Tuesday morning, June 19th, 1928, at Grace Church Parsonage, Napanee, by Rev. W. P. Woodger, B. A., when Beatrice Eileen, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herb. Windover, Selby, became the bride of D. W. Weese, only son of Mr and Mrs. Fred Weese, Newburgh. The bride wore a dress of peach georgette and lace, the bodice being made of the georgette, while frills of gold and silver lace formed the skirt She also wore the groom's gift, a rope of French pearls. Immediately after the ceremony the happy couple left on a motor trip for Toronto, Detroit and Benton Harbor, Mich. The bride travelled in a dress of printed silk, with hat to match, and a navy blue poiret twill coat trimmed with satin and fur. On their return they will reside on the groom's farm, east of Selby.

Shane—Ferguson.

The marriage of Mary Isabel younger daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Ferguson, of Mitchell, to William Albert Shane, of Newburgh, took place in College street United Church, Toronto, on 12.30 p.m. on Wednesday, July 4th. The church was prettily decorated for the occasion with palms, ferns and pink and white peonies. The officiating clergyman was Rev. Archibald Tuer, of Toronto, formerly of Mitchell. The bride, who was given in marriage by her brother, Mr. Dugald Ferguson, Mitchell, wore a beige ensemble with matching fox fur, and hat in green an beige. Her corsage bouquet was of yellow roses and ruby of the valley. The wedding music was played by Mrs. W. J. McDonald, of Toronto. Mr. and Mrs. Shane left on a motor trip to the Eastern States and Quebec. On their return they will reside near Bowmanville.

John Wesley Shier, Jr.

Entered into rest on Saturday at 6.30 p.m., June 30th, after a short illness. The late Mr. Shier was born in Tamworth Sept. 22nd, 1878. After completing his education in Napanee Collegiate, he went to Southern California remaining there until he came home to be married to Edith, eldest daughter of the late C. G. Coxall in 1904. He was in business in Croydon for one year, after which he took up a homestead in Sask., moving from there back to California in 1909. In 1917 he came back to Tamworth to take over the business previously carried on by Mr. Coxall. He was a member of both the Masonic Order and Scottish Rite, an Anglican in religion and a staunch Conservative. He leaves to mourn his loss besides his sorrowing widow, three sons and two daughters : Charles Guy, of Walkerville ; Douglas and Allan, Dorothy and Helen at home, his father, J. W. Shier, Tamworth ; his brother, Albert, of California, Russel, of Manitoba, and one sister, Mrs. D. Hinchey, Tamworth.

MacLeod—Roberts.

A very pretty wedding was solemnized at Actinolite Tuesday afternoon, July 3rd, when Sarah Dorothy Roberts, B.A., daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Roberts, became the bride of Donald Ridgway MacLeod, of Jamaica, British West Indies. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Dr. J. P. Wilson, a former pastor of the bride. After a short wedding tour the happy couple will reside in Toronto. Miss Roberts was mathematical teacher in Napanee Collegiate Institute.

The Glorious 12th at Napanee.

The Napanee L. O. Lodges are completing their preparations to entertain one of the largest gatherings ever held here to celebrate the 12th. A splendid programme has been arranged, with Dr J. W. Edwards, M.P., E. Armstrong, G. N., of Ontario East, O. J. Sutherland, G.S. of Ontario East, and Ven Archdeacon J. H. Coleman as speakers. Music will be supplied and a fine programme of sports. A tug of war between Napanee and Kingston and one between Kingston and Brockville Lodges will be an item of interest. In the evening a grand dance will be held in the Napanee Armour-ies

Died Very Suddenly.

Frank Sagar, a well-known North Fredericksburgh farmer, died with startling suddenness on Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Sagar was working on the farm and was to have called for Mrs. Sagar who was picking berries, and his failure to call caused her to hurry home. Search around the home failed to locate him and she notified the hired man, who at once joined in the search, with the result that Mr. Sagar's body was found near a fence. He had probably been dead a couple of hours. Surviving are his aged stricken widow and one daughter, Beatrice. The funeral took place from his late residence on Friday afternoon.

At the Junior Farmers' Field Day held at Presqu'ile on July 6th, and attended by young people from eight Counties, Lennox and Addington Girls' Softball Team brought great honor to the County by winning the handsome silver trophy emblematic of the Bay of Quinte Championship. The following is a list of the players : Helen Whalen, catcher ; Beatrice McGuire, pitcher ; Bernice Galbraith, 1st bas ; Louise McGuire, 2nd base ; Monna Graham, 3rd base ; Vera Galbraith, short stop ; Marjorie Moore, left field ; Stella Byrnes, centre field ; Mary Scott, right field. In the game before dinner Lennox and Addington team defeated a team from Hastings County and in the afternoon played a brilliant game with Peterborough County team, who earlier in the day had defeated the cup last year, but they lost in Victoria Peterborough team won by one plast year, but they lost in the finals this year to Lennox and Addington, with a score of 15 to 3. Beatrice McGuire's pitching and hard hitting brought great cheers from the crowd ; Helen Whalen behind the bat and Bernice Galbrath on first base played wonderful ball ; Monna Grahma on third base relieved the pitcher for part of the game and showed splendid ability. Every member of the team is deserving of special mention. The fielders gave excellent support and the whole team worked like a machine. The girls deserve great credit for bringing this Championship to the County and keeping Lennox and Addington to the front.

The Gibbard Furniture Shops gave their employees a holiday and picnic at Glen Island on Thursday. The steamer Brockville was chartered for the occasion and was loaded to capacity. A large number of cars were also used to convey the excursionists. A programme of sports, with valuable prizes, was put on at the island.

A bad motor accident occurred at Storms' Corners on the Provincial Highway on Sunday and as a result three occupants of the car were taken to Kingston General Hospital for treatment and their car is almost a complete wreck. A car driven by Earl Moore, of Sydenham, turned to take the Bath road and the American car, in order to avoid a collision, was ditched, where it turned upside down. The American car was owed by Mr. Heard, of Buffalo, and with him were his wife and three children. Mr. and Mrs. Heard were badly injured, but the three children escaped.

"Jesus saith unto her, Said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldest believe thou shouldest see the glory of God ? Then they took away the stone from the place where the dead was laid. And Jesus lifted up His eyes and said, Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me and I know that thou hearest me always : but because of the people which stand by I said it, that they may believe that thou hast sent me. And when He thus had spoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. And he that was dead came forth bound hand and foot with grave clothes : and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him and let him go. Then many of the Jews which came to Mary and had seen the things which Jesus did, believed on him." John 11 :40-45.

HEAD OF MOTOR LEAGUE OFFERS SOUND ADVICE

Twelve "Don'ts" for Motorists Suggested by R A. Stapells.

R. A. Stapells, president of the Ontario Motor League, and a motor car driver of long experience, has compiled a decalogue of twelve commandments, which he submits, if observed, would result in "safe and sane driving" by all, They are :

Don't assume that kiddies will stay on the sidewalk. They must be your care—first, last and always.

Don't ignore the pedestrians rights. He also pays taxes.

Don't sit like a bump on a log. Give signals and let the following fellow know what you are going to do.

Don't be a swivel-neck, keep your eye on the road.

Don't dawdle on the way. This is the twentieth century, not the Dark Ages.

Don't exceed the speed limit. Use ordinary every-day horse sense.

Don't cut in—it may be smart, but it is not safe.

Don't demand your right of way. Show a margin of courtesy for safety's sake.

Don't use glare lights. It is against the law, vulgar and dangerous.

Don't neglect your brakes. You may save a life by stopping quickly.

Don't take a chance at railway crossings. It might be your last.

Don't drive like a drunken man at the wheel. Solomon saw it coming and said : "The companion of fools will be destroyed."

NEW GIRL OF GERMANY

Women Are Asserting Their Rights —Spick and Span as to Clothes —More Slim as to Figure.

Not so long ago the German girl conveyed the impression of an indifferently proportioned lugger, with sails square set, and unduly overweighted aft.

To-day a more suitable analogy is that of a spick and span clipper with neat lines, the cut of her jib distinctly Parisian, says an article in the London Daily Mail by "an Englishman who has just returned after spending over two years in various German towns." Take a stroll along the Landen, visit the best of the restaurants in any large provincial town, and one beholds German girls dressed in almost the latest Paris creations. There are still a few frumps left, but they hail mostly from patrician houses, where it is considered proper to maintain the old German cult and to wear print frocks in the stalls.

The passion for slimness has reached Germany. The full-bosomed, perfunctorily dressed Gretchen with hair austerely combed is practically extinct among the younger generation. But though it is a comparatively simple affair to reduce one's figure, it is not always easy to reduce one's ankles in proportion. That is the one flaw in which there is still room for improvement—that, and the lingering prejudice that more than just a touch of powder is not quite respectable. But women are adaptable creatures, and there is little doubt that nature and artifice will soon complete the transformation.

Temperamentally, too, the German girl has changed, and therein lies an element of tragedy.

Judged by British standards, many German husbands differ vastly from the conception of what a husband should be. They are inclined to be domineering; the standard of fidelity is lower on the whole in Germany than in some other countries; and they drink a good deal.

In pre-war days all this was taken for granted. A husband was frankly allowed his fling occasionally was he not a man?—and his wife was accustomed to piloting him home after a beer party which had lasted well into the morning. She did not question him as to his whereabouts if he remained away from home longer than usual, and she accepted in humble spirit his rebukes if all was not quite in order in the household when he returned. And though there are —and always have been—many honorable exceptions, most German husbands are following the footsteps of their fathers and grandfathers.

The German wife may now be found clinching—in the peculiar fashion common to German ballrooms —at the time of day when she used to be having a knitting party or cutting up the Wurst for supper. She is demanding to be taken to dine in restaurants on days when the cook or the maid-of-all-work is out, and she is giving up beer for cocktails. She has without developed a sense of humor, rarely possessed in the old days, and is becoming a "good sport" in the truly British sense.

At present she does little more than criticize her men folk, but the day is approaching when she will demand that husbands shall conform to the new ideals. When that day dawns we shall see German husbands allowing their wives to pass through the restaurant door first, giving up their seats in omnibuses and tramway cars, and transferring to their wives something of the respect which has been man's prerogative in the past.

BATTLE DRUMS.

Origin of Instrument Lost In Mists of Antiquity—Used as Early as 1338—No Longer In Favor.

The drum is a musical instrument of great antiquity. In fact, says the Pathfinder, it is of such ancient origin that its inventor is unknown. However, Bacchus, the Roman god of wine and of the vintage, promoter of civilization, lawgiver and lover of peace, is said to have been the inventor of the old instrument.

It is known that drums of all kinds were popular in the most ancient civilizations. Representations of various types of this instrument have been found on monuments and paintings in Egypt, Assyria, India and Persia. Perhaps the first soldiers to march to the beat of the drums were the janizaries, the renegade Christians in the service of the Turks. At any rate, drums were used in the battle of Halidon Hill in 1333.

Originally drummers were gorgeously bedizened negroes. The last of these is said to have been John Baptist, of the Scots Guards, who did not disappear until about the time of the Crimean War. Even to-day we find traces of the negroes in the leopard skin and the flourishes of the bandmaster's mace at the head of the man pounding the big drum.

Tympanums, or kettledrums, were in use among the Greeks and Romans and were introduced into western Europe through the Roman civilization. Some writers claim that drums were introduced by the crusaders, but the instrument was known in England long before the crusades. Drums were not used in the British army, however, until the sixteenth century. Until the reign of Elizabeth the instrument was much larger than it is now and was held horizontally and beaten on one head only. The drum also figured prominently and romantically all through our revolutionary and civil wars. Now, however, the drum has fallen into bad graces in a number of places and its doom is threatened. Although it is hard for us to imagine a military band without a single drum, its days in such bands are likely numbered.

A few years ago the French Government, acting upon the recommendation embodied in a report made by a committee of generals in its army, decided that the drum must go. The report, in part, asserted that the drum was a serious incumbrance in marching, that rain impaired its usefulness, that its calls were indistinguishable in battle, that it consumed a period of two years to turn out an efficient drummer and that by abandoning the use of the drum many thousands of youths and men would be released for active service. Since then a number of European powers that maintained drum corps have followed the example of the French.

It is interesting to note that the famous drum of the great sea fighter, Sir Francis Drake, was his constant companion throughout his career. On it he beat the signals on his flagship when he scattered the Spanish Armada. It went with him on the first British ship that ever went around the world, and it sounded taps when, after his death in the West Indies, his body was committed to the waters of the Atlantic Ocean.

RICH MEN OF BRITAIN.

There Are 138 With More Than $500,000 a Year Each.

There are 562 millionaires in Great Britain and Northern Ireland. The latest blue book of the Inland Revenue Department gives this as the number of taxpayers who have incomes of £50,000 a year or more.

Out of the total of 562 there are 138 persons who have incomes of more than £100,000 a year. Their total income is £27,532,452 so that the average income of the group is nearly £200,000.

The number of the very rich are not increasing. In the year 1925, indeed, there were 140 men with £100,000 a year and their total income was £28,173,000.

It is shown that the total national income, also, is not increasing. The figures for the last five years are: 1923, £3,019,601,063; 1924, £2,912,820,757; 1925, £2,970,451,275; 1926, £2,944,449,789; 1927 (budget estimate), £2,900,000,000.

How the rich pay is also shown in the blue book. A £150,000-a-year man has to spend nearly half his income—to be exact, 7d. in the pound—on income and super tax. Super tax payers as a whole—all those receiving more than £2,000 a year—pay more than £66,000,000 a year to the state and the death duties amount to 40 per cent. in the case of a £2,000,000 estate.

Seven millionaires, three of whom left more than £3,000,000 each, died in the last financial year, and £6,018,478 duty was paid on their estates.

At the other end of the scale 1,228 people died in England owing more than they owned. Their debts were £3,811,011 and their property was worth £2,438,919.

Out of 110,578 estates that became liable to estate duty in 1926-27 the largest class consists of those who left between £100 and £1,000. These numbered 27,168. There were 27,026 who left between £1,000 and £5,000.

Altogether out of the total of 110,578 estates only 13,172 were worth more than 5,000.

HEALTH SERVICE OF THE CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

SUMMER DIARRHOEA.

Every year there occurs an appalling number of deaths from diarrhoea. In Canada, in the year 1926, there occurred 4,114 deaths of infants under one year of age as a result of this condition.

The best and surest protection against such a condition is breast feeding. Wherever such deaths are investigated, it is found that most of the cases occur amongst infans who are artificially fed. There are many other good reasons why infants should be fed on the natural food, but the one reason that it protects against diarrhoea is sufficient to make every mother realize her duty in this matter.

The baby who is so unfortunate as to be deprived of his natural food must receive every care. He should be under the regular supervision of the family physician. He should be fed according to the physician's instructions and no change should be made in his feeding unless they are ordered by the physician.

The baby must be dressed according to the temperature, for the time of year, in order to protect him from sudden changes of temperature against which he must be safeguarded.

Diarrhoea in a young child is a very serious condition. When it occurs, the family physician should be called at once. Thinking that the diarrhoea was caused by teething or some other condition has been responsible for delays in securing prompt treatment. Such delays may cost the baby his life.

Questions concerning Health, addressed to the Canadian Medical Association, 184 College Street, Toronto, will be answered by letter. Questions as to diagnosis and treatment will not be answered.

NEW PLUGS WILL PEP UP YOUR MOTOR

BY ERWIN GREER

(President Greer College of Electrical and Automotive Trades, Chicago, Ill.)

If you have not installed a new set of spark plugs within the last year, or if your present set has gone 10,000 miles, you will make certain of quicker starting and better engine performance during the coming summer if you install a complete set now.

Hundreds of thousands of motorists who installed new spark plugs last year, have enjoyed better service since that time, and every motorist will be more satisfied with the performance of his car if he makes it a regular practice to put in new plugs once a year.

Many people do not understand how new spark plugs improve the running of the motor. The reasons are perfectly simple and easily understood. Power is developed by the rapid combustion and expansion of the burning gas ignited by the spark at the plug points. Increased power and economy result from an intense spark that gives instantaneous ignition, more rapid expansion and complete burning of the gas.

The spark plug must furnish from 600 to 2,000 full, intense, perfectly timed sparks a minute while constantly subjected to terrific heat and hammerlike blows of the compression. Deposits of soot and carbon gradually burned into the surface of the insulating core, causing surface leakage of current, corrosion gradually sets up an electrical resistance in the electrodes, slowly but surely, a less intense spark occurs at the point of the plug.

Loss of power and waste gas and oil result from a less intensive spark that causes a lag in both ignition and flame propagation. Only a part of the gas is actually converted into power and much of it passes out of the exhaust, merely wasted.

New plugs will soon pay for themselves in saving gas and oil.

4,000 MEALS A MINUTE.

Toad Can Devour About Sixty-six Worms In a Second.

There is a Spanish toad at the London Zoo which, if it were able to keep it up, could eat four thousand meals a minute. When an ordinary meal worm was placed in the vicinity of the toad, the worm vanished within air, although there was no visible movement on the part of the toad.

A slow-motion camera was used in an attempt to solve the problem. The toad obliged with the necessary data. It was taken at the rate of 1-500th of a second per exposure. When the film was developed nothing was found that differed from the view obtained by the naked eye.

Another film was taken, this time at three times the speed. Then it was seen that the meal worm disappeared on the toad's tongue. The toad's movement was so quick, however, that it could devour about sixty-six worms in a second.

Keeping Old Age at Bay.

Half a dozen rules for keeping old age at bay, issued by the health authorities of Syracuse, N.Y., includes the following: Drink plenty of water at meals and also between meals. Look on over-fatigue as your enemy and rest as your friend; take eight hours' sleep a day. Exercise your larger muscles regularly every day.

For Belgian Research.

Belgium, taking advantage of its industrial prosperity, is raising a £20,000,000 (about $100,000,000) fund for the promotion of scientific research along mechanical and chemical lines. The fund is to be administered by the Government.

CANADIAN WOMEN'S WORK

BY LUCINDA.

When Agnes Delamoure died in Toronto recently the Canadian Woman's Press Club lost one of its most valuable newspaper women members and the hundreds of children who have been interested in the Circle of Young Canada of the Toronto Globe, of which Miss Delamoure has been the editor for ten years, have lost a sympathetic friend. Not only was she an editor, but for years she has been giving the support that a clever newspaper woman can give to the women's societies. Absolutely sincere, Miss Delamoure would never exaggerate the importance of a cause, but by her accuracy and her sense of the point to be stressed in the story of a meeting kept the women's interest before the reader of the Woman's Page of The Globe in a way that secured the sympathy of the public. Miss Delamoure was in her girlhood, a teacher, in the small village where she grew to womanhood. As a teacher she saw the best in every boy and girl. They loved her because she understood them and her understanding and love made her page for the children a success.

Another person has a cure for poison ivy—poison ivy is pure tincture of quassia poured upon the affected part. She says that the plant can be killed by drenching the roots with coal oil.

If you are not very tall two yards and a half of silk will make you a sleeveless frock in which you can play tennis or dance at the summer dances. Now you must either have long sleeves or none at all, and for young girls none at all are charming in the effect of coolness that they give. The three quarter coat of printed linen or of flannel only take a small piece of material and supply the sleeves without destroying the cool effect.

While one should avoid a dressed up look when travelling, it is a pity to think "any old thing will do," and never wear a dress suitable for a reception when on a train or boat or motoring. This reminds us of a word of warning we would give to business girls. Don't wear old finery behind a counter or in a office. You can get simple cotton frocks of the moderate price or even fugi silk in a quiet shade. A gingham dress at $3 looks far better than a georgette that cost ten times as much when you are working, no matter if you are the senior of the office girls.

The motor car has brought the town and the country near to each other, some times to the sorrow of the busy farm woman. "Let us go out to see Aunt Lizzie tomorrow, says Mrs. ——— on Saturday. I won't lay in anything for Sunday dinner, even if we don't start early, we will be in time for their dinner, they are on the old time." Alas for Aunt Lizzie is thinking of the cold dinner she has prepared, not so much of it as some of the scraps is away is away for the week-end, and has planned to go to church in the afternoon, for the service of the student officiates at the afternoon this Sunday, she sees a car stop at the cheerful voices announce that they have come to spend the day. "We thought we would surprise you. It is such fun." Not quite so much fun for Aunt Lizzie, who has had to do a meal to do already, for the farm work does not stop on Sunday as the office work does. Her plans are upset, she has to spend the rest of the day cooking and does not get to church as she had hoped to do. By the time the dishes are washed and something made for tea, it is time to milk the cows and feed the little chicks "What a nice time we will have again, say the visitors, and poor Aunt Lizzie is too polite and hospitable to say anything ungracious but we feel she must have hoped it would not be soon, or if they did come they would picnic somewhere before they turn in at the farm gate.

From the number of letters we get regarding the marketing of rugs and quilts we feel that before next year in this district at least there will be the beginning of an industry for the women of Eastern Ontario and that they will be taking advantage of the tourist mrket.

"Tourist Lodge" is the sign we see on many houses along the highways "Watch for the home with the bedroom windows raised high. I won't go into stuffy rooms," said the man at the wheel to his car load, the other day. "No, that house won't get me. Look why not one window is shut and the others are only up about five inches I won't stop till I see a chance of a good sleep with plenty of air. I will stay in the car first"

Have you ever seen the old verses, "The Perfect Guest"? It tells of the visitor who comes on the train on which she is expected. She has answered the invitation promptly and given no trouble to her hostess. She keeps her room neat and helps in the work of the home if need be. She doesn't stand around looking for something to do and get in the way of the lady of the house. Often a walk might better go off for a walk and leave the hostess in peace to carry on the day's work, as she is used to do. She will tell the visitor who is never satisfied unless she is "doing something," she is like a child that has to be played with. She also know her sister who thinks every effort made for her amusement is rather a bore and lets you feel that she would have a much better time at home. It is extremely tiresome to have to "visit" all day with your guest, but the person who drops into the way of the house and finds amusement in her hostess company and the change of scene, is a real addition to the family party.

Here is a recipe for the real old fashioned Strawberry Short Cake. Two cups flour, ½ teaspoon salt, ¼ of a cup of butter, 3 teaspoons baking powder, 1 tablespoon of sugar, three quarters of a cup of milk. Mix dry ingredients, sift twice, work in butter with your fingers, add milk gradually Divide into two parts on a floured board, rool out and bake in two pans for twelve minutes in a hot oven. Butter and spread with crushed and sweetened strawberries as many as you like Serve with cream, plain or whipped.

SWEETLY MATED.

A license was issued for the marriage of Ebenezer Sweet and Jane Lemon. The inquiring reporter who got hold of the copy had a rhyming as well as inquiring instinct and he wrote it up :

"Behold how great extremes do meet
In Jane and Ebenezer ;
For Jane's no longer sour but sweet,
And Eb's a lemon squeezer."

Ingenious Yet Simple Devices For the Table.

Many ingenious yet simple devices for the table have been invented by the head waiter at a Mayfair (London) hotel.

One invention is a machine which makes mustard in just the right quantities and of just the right consistency.

Other devices are a spring for fixing on the handle and lid of a teapot which makes it impossible for the lid to fall off, a funnel inside the teapot; an attachment for a soda-water siphon which controls the flow in such a way that, however hard the "trigger" is pressed, the liquid falls into the glass without a splash; a dripcatcher for fixing on sauce bottles; and a combined knife and fork for one-armed people.

SINGLE ROOM CARS POPULAR

When Canadian National Railways introduced the single room sleeping cars on the eleven o'clock night trains between Montreal and Toronto, it very soon became evident that this type of high-class service would be welcomed by the travelling public. As a result of the immediate popularity it was already been found necessary to place these cars in service on other trains of the company, and since June 20, these cars have been in service also on the ten o'clock night trains between these two cities.

The single room sleeping car meets the demand of those who require a little additional comfort and privacy during their travels. Each car contains fourteen single bedrooms, and each room is completely fitted with toilet requisites. The cars, introduced in Canada for the first time by the Canadian National System, are designed especially for night journeys, where the passenger boards the train between ten o'clock and midnight, and reaches his destination at an early hour next morning. As they are not intended for daytime travel, there is no additional seating accommodation in the bedrooms. In these rooms, which are delightfully decorated, the passenger finds a real bed awaiting, which is placed cross-wise of the car instead of lengthwise as in the case of an ordinary sleeping-car berth. Each pair of rooms have a connecting door, so that couples or parties travelling together may use this door, which, however, has bolts on each side for use when the rooms are sold individually. The rooms are equipped with every device for the comfort and convenience of the passenger and are filling an important place in furnishing the traveller with added comfort and convenience during his journey.

These cars are operated in addition to the club cars and other latest equipment which has become a recognied feature of the all-steel Canadian National Railways trains between the two cities.

was Maddy who brought it to Guy. She had been home that day, and on her return had ridden by the office as Guy had requested her to do. She saw the letter bore a foreign postmark, also that it was in the delicate handwriting of some female, but the sight did not affect her in the least. Maddy's heart was far too heavy that day to care for a trifle, and so, placing the letter carefully in her basket, she kept on to Aikenside.

The letter was decidedly Lucy-ish in all that pertained to her "dearest darling," her "precious Guy" but when she came to Maddy Clyde her womanly nature spoke; and Guy, while reading it, felt how good she was. Of course he might send Maddy Clyde all he wished to teach her, and it made Lucy love him better to know that he was willing to do such things. She wished she was there to help him; they would open a school for all the poor, but she did not know when mamma would let her come. That pain in her side was not any better, and her cough had come earlier this season than last. The physician had advised a winter in Naples, and they were going before very long. Then followed a few more lines sacred to the fond eye, lines which told how pure was the love which sweet Lucy Atherstone bore for Guy Remington, which, as he read, felt his heart beat with a throb of pain, for Lucy spoke to him now for the first time of what might possibly be.

"I've dreamed about it nights," she said, "I've thought about it days, and tried so hard to be resigned to feel that if God will have it so, I am willing to die before you have ever called me your little wife as you have ever called your husband. Heaven is better than earth, I know, and I am sure of going there, I think but oh, dear Guy, a life with you looks so very sweet that sometimes your little Lucy shrinks from the dark grave which would hide her from you. Guy, you once said you never prayed, and it made me feel so badly, but you will when you read this, won't you? You will ask God to make me well, and maybe He will hear you. Do, Guy, please do pray for your Lucy, far away over the sea."

Guy could not resist that touching appeal, "to pray for his little Lucy," and though his lips were unused to prayer, bowing his head upon his hands he did ask that she might live, beseeching the Father to send upon him any calamity save the one—Lucy must be spared. Guy felt better for having prayed, it was something to tell Lucy, something that would please her well, and though his heart yet was very sad, a part of the load was lifted, and he could think of Lucy now without the bitter pain her letter first had cost him. Was there nothing that would save her, nobody who could cure her? Her disease was not hereditary; surely it might be made to yield; had English physicians no skill, could no old American do better? It was possible, and as that mother of Lucy's would let her come where doctors knew something, she might get well; then she wouldn't; she was determined that no hushand should be burdened with an ailing wife, and so the mountain would not come to Mahomet, why, Mahomet must go to the mountain, and Guy fairly jumped from his chair as he exclaimed: "I have it now; he's the most skilful man I ever knew, I'll send him to England to send back to Naples where he shall go to Naples with them as their family physician; he can cure Lucy, I'll speak to him the very next time he comes here"; and with another burden lifted from his mind, Guy began to wonder where Maddy was.

He knew she had returned, for Flora had said she brought the letter, and he was about going in search of hopes of finding her and Jessie, when he heard her in the hall, as she answered some question of Mrs. Noah's; stepping to the door, he asked her to come in, saying he would, if she chose, appoint the lessons talked about so long. Ordinarily Maddy's eyes would have flashed with delight, for she had anticipated so much from those lessons now, however, there was a sad look upon her face, and she could scarcely keep from crying as she came at Guy's bidding, and sat upon the sofa, near to the window. Somehow it rested Guy to look at Maddy Clyde, who, having recovered from her first, seemed the perfect embodiment of perfect health, a health which glowed and sparkled all over her bright face, showing itself as well in the luxuriance of her glossy hair as in the brilliancy of her complexion and the flash of her lustrous eyes. How Guy wished that Lucy could share it, seemed almost a superfluity of health; and why should she? Dr. Holbrook had cured Maddy; Dr. Holbrook could cure Lucy; and so for the present dismissing that from his mind, he turned to Maddy, and said the time had come when he could give those promised lessons, asking if she would commence to-morrow, after she was through with Jessie, and what she would prefer to take up first.

"Oh, Mr. Remington," and Maddy began to cry, "I am afraid I cannot stay! They need me at home, for may Grandpa said so and I don't want to go, though I know it's wicked not to. Oh, dear! dear!"

Here Maddy broke down entirely, sobbing so convulsively that Guy became alarmed, and wondered what he ought to do quiet her.

Controlling her voice as well as she was able, Maddy told him how the physicians at the asylum had written that as Uncle Joseph was insane, no human probability never be perfectly sane, and as a change of scene would do him good, Mr. Marsham had better try taking him a while; that having been spoken with upon the subject, he seemed as anxious as a little child, even crying when the night came around and he was not at home, as he expressed it. "They have kept him so long," Maddy said, "that grandpa thought it his duty to relieve them, though he can't well afford it, and he's needed every week, and grandma will need someone to help, and I must go. I know it's wrong, but I do not want to go, try as I will."

It was a gloomy prospect to exchange Aikenside for the humble home where poverty had its abode, and it was not very strange that Maddy should shrink from it at first. She did not stop to ask what was her duty, or think how much happiness her presence might give her grandparents, or how much she might cheer and amuse the weak imbecile, her uncle. She was but human, and so, when Guy began to devise ways of preventing her going, she listened, while the pain at her heart grew less as her faith in Guy grew stronger. He would drive down with her to-morrow, he said, and see what could be done. Meanwhile she must dry her eyes and go to Jessie, who was calling her.

As Guy had half expected, the doctor came around that evening, and inviting him into his private room Guy proceeded at once to unfold his scheme, asking him first,

"How much he probably received a year for his services as physician."

The doctor could tell all about, but after a little thought, made an estimate, and then inquired why Guy had asked the question.

"Because, doc, I have a project on foot. Lucy Atherstone is dying with that they call consumption. I don't believe those doctors understand her disease, and if you will go over to England and undertake her cure, I'll give you just double what you'll get by remaining here. They are going to Naples for the winter, and undoubtedly, will spend some time in Paris. It will be just the thing for you. Lucy and her mother will be glad of your services when they know I sent you. Lucy likes you. Will you go? You can trust Maddy to me. I'll take good care that she is worthy of your when you come back."

At the mention of Maddy's name the doctor's brow darkened. He was sure that Guy meant kindly, but interested on his account to be thus joked about what he knew was a stern reality. Guy's project appeared to him at first a most foolish one, but as he continued to enlarge upon it, and the advantage it would be to the doctor, as well as to the world, the feeling of enthusiasm was kindled in his own breast; a desire to visit Naples and France, and the places he had dreamed of as a boy, but never hoped to see. Guy's plan began to look more feasible, and possibly he might have journeyed for one thought and that a thought of Maddy Clyde. He would not leave her alone with Mrs. Noah, though Guy was true to Lucy as steel. He would stay; he would watch; and in time he would win the young girl waiting now for him in the Old Abbey, waiting to tell him 'mid blushes of shame and tears of regret how she had meant to pay him for all his kindness before, but now Uncle Joseph was coming home, and he must wait a little longer.

"Would he, could he be so good?" and unmindful of Guy's presence Maddy laid her hand confidingly upon his arm, while her dark eyes looked beseechingly into his.

How the doctor wished Guy was away, and kindly taking the little hand left them together in the lighted hall. Sitting down on the sofa, and making Maddy sit beside him, the doctor began:

"Maddy, you know I mean what I say, at least to you, and when I tell you that I never will speak of it except when you speak of it, you will believe me. I know your grandfather's circumstances, and I know, too, that I could much reduce your sickness, consequently if I made one out at all, it would be a very small one.

He did not get any further, for Maddy hastily interrupted him, and her eyes flashed with pride excitement.

"I will not be a charity patient! I say I will not! I'd be a hired girl before I'd do it!"

It troubled the doctor to see Maddy so disturbed about dollars and cents but he knew that many a man possesses iron hand upon her young heart; and only because she was so young did he refrain from offering her then and there a home. "Hired girl to the ills of life in his sheltering love. But she was not prepared, and he should not force the subject upon her. Gentleness, so he restrained himself, though he did pass his arm partly around her waist as he said to her:

"I will you, Maddy, honestly, that when I want that bill liquidated I'll ask you. I certainly will, and I'll make you pay it, too. Does that satisfy you?"

Yes, Maddy was satisfied, and after a little she dared to question:

"By the way, Maddy, I have some idea of going to Europe for a few months, or a year or more. You know I am going to place Jessie to study for while in Paris. What do you think of it? Shall I go?"

The doctor had become quite necessary to Maddy's happiness. He was the first friend she had had in all her little troubles, and to lose him would be a terrible loss, and so she answered that it would be very much better for him she supposed he ought to go, though she should miss him sadly and be very lonely without him.

"Would you, Maddy? Are you in earnest? Would you be the lonelier for my being gone?" the doctor asked, eagerly. With the utmost truthfulness, Maddy replied: "Of course I should"; and when, after the conference was ended, Guy remained for a moment talking with Guy, ere bidding him good-night, he said: "I think I shall not accept your European proposition. Somebody else must cure Lucy."

The next day, as Guy had proposed, he rode down to Aikenside, telling Maddy with him, and offered so many reasons why she should not be called home that the old people began to insist, particularly as Mrs. Noah said Maddy's heart was set on the lessons Guy was going to give her. She might never have a like opportunity, and a young man said, and as a good education would put her in the way of helping them when they were older and needed her more than now, it was her duty to leave her with them. He knew they objected to her receiving three dollars a week, but they could better do just the same, and if they chose they might, with a part of it, hire a little girl to help in the work which Maddy would do were she at home. All this sounded very sensible, especially as it was backed up by Maddy's eyes fixed upon her grandfather. The sight of them, more than Guy's arguments, influenced the old man, and he decided that, if grandma were willing, Maddy should stay, unless absolutely needed at the cottage. Then the tears burst forth, telling her sweet mistress and her grandfather's neck. Maddy sobbed out her thanks, asking if it were selfish to feel so glad, and slightly to her to prefer learning rather than staying there.

"Not if that's your only reason," grandma replied, "it is right to want learning, quite right; but if my child is biased by the fine things at Aikenside, and hates to come back to her poor home, because 'tis poor, I should say it was very natural, but not exactly right."

Maddy was very happy after it was settled, and chatted gayly with her grandmother, while Guy went out with grandfather, who wished to speak with him alone.

"Young man," he said, "you have taken a deep interest in me and mine since I first came to know you, and I thank you for it all. I have nothing to give in return except my prayers, and those you have every day.

You and that doctor. Somenow you three come in together. You're any common good to Maddy. Taint everyone like you who would offer and assist on learning her. I don't know what you do it for. You seem honest. You can't, of course, ever dream of making her your wife, and, if I thought—yes, if I supposed!—here grandpa's voice trembled, and his face became a livid hue with the horror of the idea—"if I supposed this to your heart there was the shadow of an intention to deceive my child to ruin my Maddy, I'd throttle you here on the spot, old as I am and bitterly as I should repent it."

Guy attempted to speak, but grandpa motioned him to be silent, while he went on:

"I do not suspect you, and that's why I trust her with you. My old eyes are dim, but I can see enough now to know that Maddy is beautiful. Her mother was so before her and the Clydes were a handsome race. My Alice was elevated folks thought, by marrying Captain Clyde, but I don't think so. She was pure and good as the angels, and Maddy is much like her, only she has the ambition of the Clydes; has the taste for everything a little above her. She wouldn't make nobody blush if she was mistress of Aikenside."

Grandpa felt relieved when he had said all this to Guy who listened politely, smiling at the idea of his deceiving Maddy, and fully concurring in everything in all he said of her rare beauty and natural gracefulness. On their return to the house grandpa showed Guy the bedroom intended for Uncle Joseph, and Guy, as he glanced at the furniture, thought within himself how he would send down from Aikenside some of the unused articles piled away in the garret when he refurnished his house. He was becoming greatly interested in the Marshams, caring nothing for the remarks his interest might excite among the neighbors, some of whom watched Maddy half curiously as in the stylish carriage, beside its stylish owner, she rode back to Aikenside in the quiet autumnal afternoon.

CHAPTER XIII.

In the course of time Uncle Joseph came as was arranged, and on the day following Maddy and Guy rode down to see him, finding him a tall, powerfully built man, retaining many vestiges of manly beauty, and fully resembling all Mrs. Marsham had said in his praise. He seemed perfectly gentle and harmless, though when Guy was announced as Mr. Remington, Maddy noticed that in his keen black eye there was for an instant a fiery gleam, but it quickly passed away, as he muttered:

"Much too young; he was older than I and I am over forty. "It's all right."

And the fiery eye grew soft and almost sleepy in its expression, as the poor lunatic turned next to Maddy, telling her how pretty she was, asking her if she were engaged, and bidding her to be careful that her fiance was older than a dozen years older than herself.

Uncle Joseph seemed to take to her from the very first, following her from room to room, touching her fair soft cheeks, smoothing her silken hair, telling her Sarah's used to curl, asking if she knew where Sarah was, and finally crying for her as a child cries for its mother, when at last she went away. Much of this Maddy had repeated to Jessie, as in the twilight they sat together in the parlor at dialect of Mr. and Mrs. Marsham, and remembered that they were Maddy's grandparents. Not that it was anything to him. Oh, no! Only as an inmate of his family she felt interested in her, more so perhaps than a young man were apt to be interested in their sister's governess.

Had Guy then been asked the question, he would, in all probability have acknowledged that in his heart there was a feeling of superiority to Maddy Clyde, that she was not quite the equal of Aikenside's heir, nor yet of Lucy Atherstone. It was natural; he had been educated to that difference, but any haughty arrogance of which he might have been guilty was kept down by his extreme good sense and generous nature. Old Noah! He liked Maddy; he liked to look at her as in the becoming crimson merino which he really and truly and finally had given her, she sat before him, with the firelight falling on her hair and making shadows on her sunny face.

Guy was luxurious in his tastes, and it seemed to him that Maddy was peculiarly adapted to set off that room, or in fact all the rooms at Aikenside. She would disgrace none of them, and he found himself saying that his confidence had made her something to him—almost—no, no, regardless do not fall to abusing Guy, or accuse him of forgetting Lucy Atherstone, for he did not. The sight of her was very sweet that evening, and in his dreams that night Lucy and Maddy shared pretty equally, for the latter was associated with the lessons of to-morrow, while Lucy was the bright daystar for which he lived and hoped.

It did not take long for the people of Sommerville to hear that Guy Remington had actually turned schoolmaster, having in his library two hours or more each day Jessie's little girl-governess, about whose brilliant beauty there was so much said—people wondering, as people will, where it would end, and if it could be possible that the haughty Guy had forgotten the English Lucy and gone to educating a wife.

The doctor, to whom these remarks were repeated, made, and justly parried his teeth, then said savagely that "if Guy chose to teach Maddy Clyde, he did not see those business it was," and then rode over to Aikenside to see the teacher and pupil, half hoping that Guy would soon tire of his task and give it up. But Guy grew more and more pleased with his employment, until, at last, from giving three hours or his time, he came to give her four, esteeming them the pleasantest of the whole twenty-four. Guy was proud of Maddy's improvement, praising her often to the doctor, who soon marveled at the rapid development of her mind and the progress she made, grasping a knotty problem before it was half explained, and retaining with wonderful tenacity what she learned.

It mattered nothing to Guy that neighbors gossiped, there were none familiar enough to tell him what was said, except the doctor or Mrs. Noah; and he heard but few of the remarks made so frequently as in Honedale, so in Sommerville, Maddy was a favorite, and those who interested them-selves most in the matter never said anything worse of her and Mr. Guy than that he might perhaps be educating Maddy for a governess, and that it would be a great "come up" for Grandfather Markham's child. But Maddy was unconscious of such a thing, and kept on her pleasant way, reciting every day to Guy and going every Wednesday to the red cottage, whither, after the first visit to Uncle Joseph, Guy never accompanied her. Jessie, on the contrary, went often to Honedale, and was at least always greeted her coming, stealing up closely to her, whispering softly: "Didn't come again."

From the first Uncle Joseph had taken to Jessie, calling her Sarah for a while, and then changing the name to "Daisy," and when Jessie said, "Little girl," he persisted in calling her, watching from his window for her coming, and when whenever Maddy appeared without her. At first Agnes, from her city home, forbade Jessie's going so often to see a lunatic, but when Jessie pleaded her poor lady-man's delight at sight of her, telling how quiet and happy he seemed if Maddy were there, how he sat on her head, or touch her hair, she withdrew her restrictions, and, as if moved to an unwonted burst of tenderness, wrote to Jessie to tell her how that crazy man all you can; he needs it so much."

A few weeks after there came another letter from Agnes, but this time it was to Guy, and its contents darkened his handsome face with anger and vexation. Maddy Clyde's name had heard the gossip, and written it to Guy, adding in conclusion: "Of course I know you will not mind me, even if there were no Lucy Atherstone, you, of all men, would not stoop to Maddy Clyde. I do not presume to advise, but I will say this, that now she is growing a young lady, folks will keep on talking so long as you keep her there in your house; and it's hardly fair toward Lucy."

This was what knotted up Guy's fair forehead, and made Jessie said, "real cross for once." Somehow he fancied, latterly, that the doctor did not like Maddy's being there, while every one, Mrs. Noah excepted, kept her out of his way as soon as the lessons were ended. What did they mean? What was there for people to say why did they presume to interfere with him? He'd know, at all events; and summoning Mrs. Noah to his presence, he told that good lady the letter pertaining to Maddy, and then asked what it meant.

"It means that folks are in a constant worry for fear you'll fall in love with Maddy."

"I? I fall in love with that child!" Guy repeated, laughing at the idea, and forgetting that he had long since accused the doctor of that very thing. "Dainty Lucy, and Maddy Clyde," and "tain't strance they do. Maddy is not a child; she's nearer sixteen than fifteen, and pretty enough and if you'll excuse my boldness, I must say I ain't any too well pleased with the goin's-on myself; not that I don't like Maddy, for I do, and don't blame her an atom. She's as innocent as a new-born babe, and I hope she'll stay so, but I'm free to say, Mr. Guy, you—now tell me honest—do you think as much of Lucy Atherstone, as you used to, before you took on school-keepin'?"

Guy did not like to be interfered with, and naturally high-spirited, he at first flew into a passion, declaring that he would not have folks meddling with him, that he thought of Lucy constantly, all the time, and he did not know what more he could do; that 'twas a pity if a man could not enjoy himself in his own way, provided that way were harmless; that he'd never spent so happy a winter as the last that.

Here Mrs. Noah interrupted him with: "That's it, the very it; you want nothing better than to have that girl always close to you when she recites, as she does; and once when she was sewin' out some of them phases and minuses, and things, her slate rested on your knee; it did. I saw it with my own eyes, and then, me sat, Jessie Lee drummin' on the piano, why don't you bend over her, and turn the leaves, and count the time, as you do when Maddy plays. I know does it happen that lately Jessie is one too many when you hear Maddy's lessons. She was no 'suspicious,' but I know she ain't sent off for nothin'; I know you'd rather be alone with Maddy Clyde than to have anybody present; isn't it so?"

Guy began to wince. There was much truth in what Mrs. Noah had said. He did devise various methods of getting rid of Jessie, when Maddy was in his library, but it had never looked to him in just the light it did when presented by Mrs. Noah, and he doggedly asked what Mrs. Noah would have him do.

"First and foremost, then, I'd have you tell Maddy yourself that you are engaged to Lucy Atherstone; second I'd have you write to Lucy all about it, and if you honestly can, tell her that you only care for Maddy as a friend; third, I'd have you send the girl—"

"Not away from Aikenside! I never—will!" and Guy rose to his feet.

The mine had exploded, and for an instant the young man reeled, as he caught a glimpse of where he would; still he would not believe it, or confess to himself, how strong a place in his affections was held by the beautiful young girl no longer a child. It was almost a year since that April afternoon when he first met Maddy Clyde, and from a timid, bashful child, of fourteen and a half, she had grown to the rather tall and rather self-possessed maiden of fifteen and a half, seventeen sixteen, as Mrs. Noah said, "almost a woman"; and as if to verify the latter fact, she herself appeared at that very moment, asking permission to come in and find a book, which had been mislaid, and which she needed in hearing Jessie's lessons.

"Certainly, come in," Guy said, and folding his arms he leaned against the mantel, watching her as she hunted for the missing book.

There was no pretense about Maddy Clyde, nothing put on for effect, and yet, in every movement she showed marks of great improvement, both in manner and style. Of one hundred people who might glance at her, ninety-nine would look a second time, asking who she was. Naturally graceful and utterly self-forgetful, she always appeared to good advantage and never to better than now, when two pairs of eyes were watching her, as standing on tiptoe, or kneeling upon the floor to look under the secretary, she hunted for the book. Not the most suspicious had Maddy of what was occupying the thoughts of her companions, though, as she left the room and glanced brightly up at Guy, it struck her that his face was dark and moody, and a painful sensation flitted through her mind that all was not right. She had intended to say she had intended to say good-night, but instead she went out, and returned to her task with Jessie.

"Well," was Mrs. Noah's first comment, as the door closed on Maddy, but as Guy made no response to that, she continued, "She is pretty. That you won't deny."

"Yes, more than pretty. She'll make a most beautiful woman."

Guy seemed to talk more to himself than to Mrs. Noah, while his foot kicked the fender, and he mentally compared Maddy with Lucy, each other, and tried to think that it was not the result of that comparison, which rather pleased Mrs. Noah, which affected him unpleasantly. The remark or remarks were as follows:

"Of course she'll make a splendid woman. Everybody notices her now for her beauty, and that's why you've no business to keep her here where you see her every day. It's a wrong to her, lettin' yourself alone."

Guy looked up, and Mrs. Noah continued:

"I've been a girl myself, and I know that Maddy can't be treated as you treat her without its having an effect. She thinks that it's engaged her head yet, but it will bimeby, and then good-by to her happiness."

"For pity's sake, what do you mean? Do not talk to me in riddles. What have I done to Maddy, or what am I going to do?"

Guy spoke savagely, and his boots were in great danger of being burned as he kicked vigorously against the fender, while Mrs. Noah, raising and lowering her voice, Mrs. Noah replied:

"You are going to teach her to love you, Guy Remington, just as sure as my name is Noah."

"And is that anything so very bad, I'd like to know? Must girls do not find love distasteful," and Guy walked hastily to the window, where he stood for a moment looking out upon the soft April snow which was falling, and feeling anything but satisfied either with the weather or himself; then turning, he said, now stay a moment before the fire, he said: "I understand you now. You would save Maddy Clyde from the misery of loving one who can't love in return. For a girl to love, though the best of people, they are not like Maddy, and you know it."

"I did not know it, and know it, and pleased that her boy, as she called Guy, had shown some signs of penitence and amendment, she said she did not think it necessary to send Maddy home; she did not advise it either. She like the girl, and what she advised was this, that Guy should send Maddy and Jessie to boarding school. Agnes, she knew, would be willing, and it was the best thing he could do. Maddy would thus learn what was expected of a teacher, and as soon as she graduated, she could procure some eligible situation, or if Lucy was there, and desired it, she could come and stay forever for all that she cared.

"And during the vacations, where must she go then?" Guy asked.

"Go where she pleases, of course. As Jessie is so fond of her, and they are much like sisters, it will not be improper for her to come here, as I see, provided Agnes is here. Her presence, of course, would make no difference." Mrs. Noah replied, while Guy continued:

"I know you are right; that is, I do not wish to do Maddy a harm by placing temptation in her way, neither will I have everybody meddling with my business. I tell you I won't, I don't mean you, for you have a right to say what no one else has," and he glanced half angrily at Mrs. Noah. "But if I can't take an interest in a girl, because I once injured her, without every old woman in Christendom thinking she must needs fall in love with me, and so be ruined for life, Maddy Clyde has too good sense for that, or will have when I tell her about Lucy."

A NEW PALESTINE ERA.

Inauguration of a Harbor at Haifa Will Mark Boom.

It was only in 1918 that Palestine discovered that it could no longer do without a harbor — that is modern Palestine; for in pre-war Palestine two harbors were thought more than harbors. This year, however, will see the inauguration of the construction of a new modern port at Haifa at a cost of $5,000,000.

Haifa Bay swings from Mt. Carmel in the south in a wide sweep to Acre, twenty miles to the north. Acre peninsula forms a natural breakwater to Carmel faces north; so the sea basin is landlocked save to the northwest. When it is completed, Haifa harbor will be the largest and best equipped port along the hitherto inhospitable coast between Port Said and Smyrne.

Haifa is geographically and also graphically is the commercial key position of the Near East. It is the junction of the broad gauge railway from Egypt and the narrow gauge system which runs east through Beisan into Syria, to join with the Damascus track to the north and with the interior Hejaz railway, which leads to Medina and Arabia. Beisan is the future junction of the Jordan Valley branch whereby the inhabitable portion of the depths of the Dead Sea will be carried to the seaboard at Haifa, which will by then have been modernized to cope with the strain of the new mineral traffic. Further east lies Irak and the newly tapped oilfields of Mosul, where the international Turkish Petroleum Company already is speaking of pipe lines across the desert to Haifa to test its new capacity with yet another category of traffic. Finally there is the tourist traffic to the Holy Land, which in the last five years has developed out of all knowledge, especially from America.
